KeyMacro can be used to transfer application keys, registry keys, certificates and more between computers by editing a temporary text file. This program is intended to be used to export key and certificate information from a 32-bit or 64-bit (depending on the target platform) Windows program to a file. This file is then used as the input for the import function, which is provided for backward compatibility with previous versions of the program. Most recently installed programs are listed by default and the user has the option to import the information from one or more of them. Alternatively, you can select a folder to save the output files to. You may want to use KeyMacro in situations where you want to:

- Export a group of certificates to a text file for future import.
- Export a large number of keys or values from an application to a text file for future import.
- Export a private key from a Windows application for secure archiving.
