HyperMotion technology will be used in Fifa 22 Cracked Version from launch at launch for three main reasons:

- It gives the game's AI to make decisions based on more than a simple linear player skill matrix. The AI is now able to consider a player's individual attributes, skill, fitness, tactical positioning, fatigue level and surrounding players. This adds in-game intelligence to the player-on-player encounters.
- Provides a different, deeper understanding of player interaction, including their relationship to the ball and to their team-mates. We know the ball spends more time in a player's feet than any other part of their body, and in FIFA we can create a player's role in a match by analysing and modelling this activity.
- It provides a more realistic and cohesive interaction between players, allowing more sustainable high-intensity challenges that are more reliable. We've been working on the gameplay for more than two years now, and we've applied the learnings from every player interaction and match event we've recorded in the design and modelling stage. Every single player movement, tackle, throw-in, slide tackle, shot is modelled and analysed and tweaked until it's perfect. Then we've integrated that into the gameplay engine and created a host of new behavioural rules to govern how these interactions happen. It's then used to inform our AI, which in turn improves its understanding of the game itself and how it reacts in game. What has been learned from this in-depth design work has been merged with the physicality of real-life footballers and fans, and what they do in training on a week-by-week basis, creating a unique environment that has never been tried in a game before. It's a mixture of physics-based and data-driven design. There is an element of logic to the game, which of course helps with the AI, but it also helps create the pure feeling that we want to instil in the game: the ability to pass the ball to a team-mate in a comfortable and natural way, without needing to think about blocking the ball. We also call that "hands on the pitch" - creating the best football experience possible. The players have 22 different attributes, skills and attributes, and we can look at a player's attributes in-game and make decisions about what his actions are and how we should react to them. We
