Escape the matrix... in a video game! Everything is Black and White features an overly long name, as well as over 30 levels to explore and utilize the unique shifting mechanic. With a press of a button the background will instantly shift between black and white, providing new objects to interact with and obstacles to avoid. Music created by iviE

Huge variety of levels, it took me a while to beat the level 50 boss but it was worth the effort. The shifting mechanic adds a lot of depth to a game where the background is black and white, and the enemies are glitchy and the levels and enemy types constantly change, very cool! The music is also great, although the beginning may be a little choppy. Everything is Black and White features an overly long name, as well as over 30 levels to explore and utilize the unique shifting mechanic. The game is black and white. Whether this was his intention or not, his name has been taken out of context and warped beyond recognition. I get the humor behind the change, but I think people are taking it too far. Whether or not it was intended, you get the intended message. I'm glad I read the title before I took it into the game, and got a laugh out of it. Features: - Freezer Physics - Freeze the objects you freeze and watch them crumble away into dust! - Surreal, atmospheric visual style - Physics based puzzle solving - Puzzles inspired by real physics - Gravity-proof puzzles - Tight physics engine - no infinite loops or stuck parts - Over 50+ puzzles - 4 characters to explore - Dozens of items to interact with - 180 degrees scrolling - New gameplay every 3 levels - not just new characters - Full 3D playback - Draw on Screen mode - Dual screen mode - Original soundtrack - Automatic install - Android 3.0 (Android 4.0 is coming soon) - Totally stable Developed by Ice-Brick Games of 4 years of working and only 1.5 months of learning about Android development and coding (no previous programming experience required) That's a mouthful! To sum it all up, FreezeME is a Puzzle/Platformer in which the objects are frozen when you touch them or watch them crumble away when they're frozen. To figure out how to freeze something, use the camera on R's neck to find out what object you're touching. Figure out the correct sequence to freeze the objects and you're done!

Features: - Gameplay: When R's best friend M is abducted by the cat, he'll cry about it at night. In order to see M again, R will have to follow the trail of his tears.

The journey takes her through the city in search for clues. R encounters a host of bizarre objects in the frozen-life: freezers, vending machines, gravestones, and so on. Every new object will throw a new puzzle for R to solve. When R gets it wrong, the object can't be frozen. When R gets it right, she can freeze it and see how it's used. In the city, you'll find everything from convenient convenience stores and luxury vehicles to your typical ghetto squatters. - Freezer Physics: Every object has its own motion set-up. When you freeze an object, you have to freeze its position in time, and then fix the time for when it's going to fall to the ground. This may seem like you're creating a paradox, but it is not. You can freeze objects that are falling, or objects that you've fixed in the past, without creating on Hold This post was recommended to me by Dan Poniewozik, a friend who wrote the wonderful book The Return of the Reader and who teaches on the subject at Duke. I seriously wonder if I can stand up there and comfortably say, "It's hard to be a writer," when I'm not. Wait a minute, now. Let's break this down. This is not being a "writer" The first thing that comes to my mind when I hear that is that this isn't being a "writer." This is going to hemo-political territory. Wait, really? "Really?" OK. This is being a writer, or a visible manifestation of the fact that one wishes to be a writer There is a particular difference between the two: being a writer is being both a reader and a writer at once. It is the intentionality of trying to create something out of nothing that makes it a writer, rather than someone who has very little success holding up a box that gets crowded at the grocery or some other soft squish deal. While it's entirely proper and given for those who want to be writers, it's not to all who want this. Side note: a funny thing happened when I asked Alan Sokal to write a comment on this post. He responded by remarking that we should ban everyone who visits this blog from the interwebs until they've completed a blogging course. Now, I'm not talking about that person who writes to the jaded well-read blogger and starts with some complaint about their father or their job or that the gas station prices always seem to be higher than the price that can be found on the gas station web page. I'm talking about the person who decides to get out of bed in the morning and start typing. It happens. It's going to be fine. Having said that, no writer in the history of the art form has ever gotten out of bed and started typing before the first cup of coffee. I've written before about the moment that I decided to be a writer. The goal: be a writer. Do something out of nothing.

Home Secretary Theresa May said foreign extremists who killed a British aid worker with his wife in Syria and a father of two in Nigeria were "contemptible". She said Britons who went to fight with IS were "wrong and deserve no mercy". Ms May added more would be expelled from the UK but they may not all have known about the risks. Meanwhile, Home Secretary Theresa May has told the Commons that police intend to provide more support to local councils in improving the security of the country's religious sites. In a written response to a Labour MP, she said the "safety and security of places of worship is a priority for all in this country" and councils should "make use of the resources available to them to improve safety and security". 'Shocked and horrified' The comments come after the deaths of David Haines, a Briton of Scottish origin, and Alan Henning, a South African, from the UK. Mr Haines, 43, was abducted by IS militants in northern Syria in November 2013
