Software that lets you store all your logins and passwords on a server, making it safe to access from anywhere. KeyWallet Requirements: Windows XP or newer; Mac OS X 10.11 or newer KeyWallet 6.7.0 Screenshots:A new study by researchers from New York's Albert Einstein College of Medicine and Stanford University has found that morphine (or morphine-like drugs) can significantly lower post-birth oxytocin levels. Oxytocin is the hormone associated with bonding and attachment between mother and child. Low levels of post-birth oxytocin are associated with higher risks of breastfeeding problems. The average number of serious breastfeeding problems in a breastfeeding mother is four. And it's even higher in mothers who have been prescribed opiates (used for pain relief) during pregnancy. Most of these women have been prescribed opiate pain relief by doctors not well-versed in the science of breastfeeding. "There are few good, randomized controlled trials about these drugs in breastfeeding women, and we often can't tell which breastfeeding problems are related to what drugs mothers are taking or what drugs babies were given to the mothers. By studying a broad range of factors related to breastfeeding, we can begin to separate the effect of drugs from the effect of other factors," says Dr. Sophia Hollister, lead author of the new study and an assistant professor of medicine at Einstein. The results of the study were published in the January 29 online edition of Pediatrics. In the study, Hollister's team examined data from the 'Women, Infants and Children (WIC)' federal program to determine the effect of opiates on breastfeeding. They compared 199 mothers who received opiates during pregnancy with 199 who were not given the drugs. Mothers in the control group were treated for pain with pain relief from a variety of medications not known to be related to breastfeeding problems, such as acetaminophen or ibuprofen. Mothers in both groups were interviewed and surveyed about the breastfeeding situation, and infants were weighed weekly. advertisement The women who received opiates were more likely to have postpartum depression, to breastfeed for a shorter period and to get pregnant again quickly after giving birth. Mothers on opiates were about 40 percent more likely to report serious breastfeeding problems, including latch-on issues, sore nipples, breast infections and early weaning. "We found the main problem in women who received opiates was prolonged weaning and early stopping of the breastfeeding process.
