Acidic and neutral amino acid concentrations in rat medulla, hypothalamus, and whole brain after kainic acid-induced seizures. Kainic acid-induced seizures in rats produced long-lasting changes in the neurochemistry of brain areas studied. These included a three-fold increase of the concentrations of tryptophan in hypothalamus, medulla, and whole brain and of tyrosine in brain areas with relatively high concentrations of norepinephrine, not in those that contain dopamine. Aspartic acid and glutamic acid concentrations decreased in hypothalamus and medulla after seizures, in agreement with a decrease in the concentration of glutamine, which is a precursor to aspartate and glutamic acid synthesis. The changes in amino acid concentrations, except those of tryptophan, were unrelated to changes in whole brain dopamine and serotonin concentrations, which were not altered by seizures. The concentration of glycine decreased in hypothalamus and medulla but increased in whole brain. Glycine concentrations were not altered in whole brain by seizures that reduced glutamate concentrations. These results suggest that seizures produce relatively specific changes in amino acid content in different brain areas and that these changes cannot be accounted for by changes in neurotransmitter concentration. Changes in the concentrations of several other amino acids, including beta-alanine, taurine, tyrosine, and cystine, also were observed in different brain areas after seizures. These results suggest that the neurochemical effects of seizures occur in the brain at the cellular level and that changes in the amino acid composition of brain tissue may be an important factor in the brain's response to epilepsy.
