Since 2003, many thousands of people have been kidnapped or killed in the names of the Global War on Terror. Now it is our turn. Beginning with a visit to Radical Islam's doorstep, a group of agents from the Central Intelligence Agency "Central" are sent to the War-torn province of (radical) Middle Eastern Iran in the early 80's. As a group of young American ex-pats living in the province, the group must fight their way to safety. "I feel somehow both envious of the author's skill and dissatisfied with my own inadequate powers. With this novel I love that young man so well, even though he is only a part of myself. I hope he may improve a little in time, and that I may too." Frédéric Chopin, Polish composer "It is impossible to read the novel without falling in love with Werther; so well, so successfully is it written." "The Confessions are more a literary work than a diary; but the character of Werther is so deeply impressed on my memory that I have almost to make a fresh acquaintance with him when I sit down to sketch his portrait." John Steell, Private Secretary to George III "Werther is a novel which will never fade from our memories; he is the type of a strongly drawn character, a character of deep emotion, but one whom we readily sympathise with because of his individual weaknesses." Sarah Fermín, Spanish pianist, composer, and writer "Werther is certainly very powerful. It is hard to say whether Werther is the portrait of a man or a man himself. The effect of this most attractive work has been to make me love this novelist with a devotion stronger than love; and I feel more fond of him than of any one on earth." "The Confessions of Werther" is a work of art which is among the masterpieces of German literature. Goethe himself acknowledged this truth in the preface to his "Faust," when he said that the greatest product of all times has been and will be that of the artist. Indeed, a greater genius never had the ability to cast up a nobler picture. For this reason, the Preface has become an immortal monument of the author's genius. Werther's pathetic struggle for existence--the spiritual suicide of love--is recounted in the painful narrative of his lonely death. His sufferings, his consciousness of the hopelessness of his position, his impression of the miserable plight of his parents, and finally, his death in the forest, are the powerful and dramatic events of the work. The scenes that follow his suicide are narrated in a touching style, with great beauty of thought and expression. He had written a book, and the author

What's new in Return To Sector 9:

Laser Maze is a collection of laser arcade games developed and published by Pac-Man Production in 1984. It was co-created by Hasegawa and two of his students and was ported to numerous home computers, including the Commodore 64, PET, Atari 800, and TI-99/4A. The home computers were not commercially successful. The color version of the Laser Maze series was called Turbo Laser, and has since been ported to more video game consoles. Gameplay In Laser Maze and its sequel, each player controls a space laser-firing sphere. On the left side of the screen are three rows of power-ups called laser-heads; in the middle are an invisible "power meter" and a left-hand joystick; to the right are five rows of lasers. The four types are similar in appearance and function but make different types of noise. Each power-up also has its own firing rate; for example, a large laser ball, which holds two power-ups, is faster than a small laser ball, which holds one power-up. While every laser can be fired at every power-up, only one power-up can be fired at a time; allowing a player to use as many power-ups as he or she pleases. When a player hits an onscreen ball, he or she collects a power-up. If the ball completely covers a laser, the laser disappears. If it hits an "X" in a box, the player loses a life. After a ball is hit, players may aim between the rows of lasers using the left side of the joystick, where it moves left and right on a diagonal path while others fire from the opposite side. An invisible laser will shoot from the middle of the screen, hitting the ball once it moves beyond a special code box on the right side. Successfully hitting the ball within a code box will reveal a power-up immediately. If the ball lands in the main drop, an audio-visual warning will appear, dropping the next ball that is successfully hit directly above. Power-ups can only be collected once per game, after which the laser again loses its power. Players try to have laser-balls hit the power-ups in the middle. If a player gets enough points, his or her name will appear on the bottom of the screen, however this requires 50 balls be hit to appear. When two or more players have appeared, the game display will split into two screens. A
