The present invention is in the technical field of recombinant DNA technology. More specifically, the invention is directed to novel DNA sequences which encode particular mammalian hemoproteins such as fetal hemoglobin. The invention is also directed to novel nucleic acid molecules comprising said DNA sequences, recombinant cells comprising said DNA sequences, vectors and expression vectors bearing said DNA sequences, processes for the production of said hemoproteins using said recombinant cells, and to the recombinant hemoproteins themselves. Hemoglobin (Hb) is the oxygen-carrying protein of blood. It is composed of two subunits, A (alpha) and B (beta), each of which has a molecular weight of about 35,000. Hb A is the major form of Hb present in adult human blood. The Hb A subunits are encoded by two different genes located on different chromosomes, and together encode the fully assembled adult Hb. In certain adult hemoglobinopathies (including sickle cell disease) and in fetal Hb, the amount of Hb is greatly increased relative to Hb A, and the major form of Hb is that having fetal hemoglobin (Hb F) rather than Hb A. Several considerations make the production of fetal hemoglobin (Hb F) by expression in cell culture an attractive goal for a variety of therapeutic reasons. For example, Hb F has proven effective in preventing some disease states, especially in the treatment of sickle cell anemia
