When injuries are minor, the homeostasis of the skin is maintained. When it becomes compromised, the skin takes time to heal, but after an appropriate period of recovery, the skin will be restored to its original condition. Wounds to the skin can be broadly divided into two broad categories - superficial and deep wounds. A superficial wound is caused by a force or an impact sufficient to cause tissue damage without penetrating the dermis, while a deep wound penetrates the dermis. Wounds may also be classified as primary or secondary depending on the cause and the time taken for repair. In most cases wounds are repaired by the lymphatic system which is responsible for the removal of waste products from the skin. A superficial wound is a cut or incision on the skin that has less depth than the dermal layer. The depth of the cut or incision is less than or equal to the depth of the skin. The skin cut is typically large in comparison to the tissue that it has cut, and the layer of skin is usually damaged just a little. A cut on the skin can be caused by a sharp object that cuts or gouges the skin, such as a knife or a sharp instrument, an object that does not penetrate the skin itself, but that makes a deep puncture in the tissue below the skin surface, such as a needle, piercing instrument, or a bared object when struck, such as a brick or the other side of a door. The area immediately surrounding a wound is inflamed as the result of an attack on the body. When the wound heals, the skin will be repaired through the process of skin regeneration. (opera) The Cave (French: Le souterrain), Op. 25, is a dramatic one-act opera on a libretto by Paul Claudel with a score composed by Jacques Offenbach and orchestrated by Charles Lamotte. It was their third collaboration, following a book by Claudel (Les deux autels), music by Offenbach (The Grand Duke) and the libretto by Edmond Fleg. In German, the work was originally known as Der Höllenhund (or Der Höllenhund) with texts by Robert Fitz-James Stuart. The opera opened at the Théâtre de l'Ambigu-Comique in Paris on 16 January 1895, and ran for eight performances. The musical work is derived from an earlier poem by the romantic poet Albrecht von Euler, with a libretto in three stanzas. The principal characters are Brother Guido (Ausdruck, born Loomis) and Pundit Guillaume. The work was an instant success, staged in 1894 in Paris, London, New York, and Buenos Aires, and is still frequently performed in the concert hall repertoire. In 1896 it was performed at the Royal Opera House in London in both the first complete production of an Offenbach opera and the first production of a work by Claudel (the fifth in the history of opera). History and text The Cave was composed in four weeks in December 1893 and completed in January 1894. While the libretto is by Claudel, it was not his idea—as he put it: Personally, I would have preferred Guillaume or La Dame aux Camélias; the idea of taking on —no, with an air more or less theatrical—a scene at the bottom of the earth did not satisfy my sense of poetry and melodrama. Claudel explained his involvement with the selection of the libretto, and his dissatisfaction with Les deux autels (or Les deux autels and La Belle Hélène)—Norman Brooks says that he "gave up writing for the moment"—in terms of a development of his ideas as an artist, but also "from a sonet in search of a poem": The idea to write a libretto as a sonnet, and even as an epic poem in a certain way already existed. Of course, what I've also read has all

Jürgen Klopp likes to be happy: that much has been made of his apparent aesthetic temperament, evidenced by his gentle smile and a more occasional throwing his arms up in the air in mirthful exasperation. But while his early reputation was that of a relentlessly dour manager on a mission, Klopp now seems to have an all-consuming joy of football that none of his predecessors have been remotely able to match. His rich baritone laugh punctuates every press conference, his cry of "na ja, na ja, na ja," his own personal version of the fans' traditional "Wir sind die Mannschaft", his shock at Sebastian Kehl being the one to suffer on Sunday night in the Champions League semi-final first leg against Bayern Munich. Leipzig's key man: Klopp's record of one win in 12 CL matches has left fans at home in droves | Andy Brassell Read more The 63-year
