The Incredible Adventures of Van Helsing 3 Torsion of deformed aneurysm of the median arcuate ligament in pregnancy. A 36-year-old multiparous woman underwent an exploratory laparotomy at 24 weeks' gestation because of a mass in the upper abdomen. Intraoperative ultrasound confirmed the presence of a large midgut cyst lying in the region of the duodenum, the stomach, and the small intestine. An enlarged median arcuate ligament was identified but was not torsed. Microscopic examination revealed mucus secretion but no evidence of inflammation. A cystic mass arose from the thickened wall of the ligament and displaced adjacent structures. Cytologic findings in the ears of feral cats: a retrospective histologic review of 233 cases. To describe cytologic findings in the ears of cats and to compare the cytologic results with a histologic diagnosis of otitis externa or inflammation of the pinna and external auditory canal, which was present in 52% of cats. Retrospective review. Cytologic results from the ears of feral cats that were submitted to the laboratory for clinical evaluation between June 1999 and July 2007 were reviewed. Tissues from the ear canal were submitted in 228 cases, and ear tissue from 27 cats was submitted by the referring veterinarians. Sixty-two cases, 4 of which were from cats with an incomplete medical workup, and 7 from cats without medical workup, were excluded from the study. Of the remaining 141 cats, 51 (36.2%) had similar cytologic results in their ears and were positive for inflammation in the ear canal; 18 cats (12.8%) had inflammation in the ear canal and normal cytologic findings in the ear canal; and 72 cats (51.4%) had normal cytologic results in their ears and in the ear canal. Based on a histologic diagnosis of otitis externa or inflammation of the pinna and external auditory canal, 52% of cats had inflammation in the ear canal, with positive cytologic findings in 38 (64.4%) cats. Cytologic testing may be a useful adjunct in the evaluation of cats with signs of upper airway disease, especially in cats with negative physical examination findings or those that did not undergo biopsy. In addition, if ears are going to be evaluated, cytologic findings of the ear canal should be considered. This is a bit of a draft, but let me know what you think. Regards Del
