Roblox is an online game platform and game creation system developed by Roblox Corporation that allows users to program games and play games created by other users. The Roblox platform allows users to create an in-game environment via a programming interface called LUA. Players can also buy virtual items and pay to modify existing games. Players can earn Robux, the game's virtual currency, by completing in-game tasks, controlling games and rooms through sharing code, and by competing in Roblox's game leagues. Players can also earn Robux through advertising revenue. Roblox's website, game creation tools, and Roblox Studio are free. Robux can also be used to buy virtual items for games including things like furniture, clothing, and decorations. Roblox is a genre-neutral platform that allows players to program their own games (to extend Roblox Studio), and plays any game created using Roblox's programming interface. Rather than creating user accounts, players engage in their activities in games which they can join at any time, though they can also create independent games. Players participate within a community, which Roblox describes as "family." As part of this community, players can join clubs, guilds, parties, and other groups that are organized by games or tasks. Players can create their own game-related organizations, and can invite their friends to play games created by the organization, as well as create and join games for the organization. Roblox is a freemium game and users can spend Robux to play games (or otherwise alter the appearance and behavior of games), buy virtual items, create content, modify content that other users have created, and take part in online communities. As of August 2020, Roblox had 164 million monthly active users, including more than half of all American children under 16. The company's website states that Roblox users spend an average of 35 minutes a day on the platform.
