If you've not had a look at Kubernetes before, it's a Paas which allows you to deploy services in a containerised environment. Essentially, each service (and service type) is represented by a Docker image, and an operator is responsible for running the service (which starts and cleans up the container as needed). If you're new to Kubernetes, a good place to start is by reading a series of introductions to the topic from Netflix. First, we need to establish how we're going to store and access our data. I'm using Kafka as a message queue which will store Events. Here's the schema for Events : We're also using Azure Table Storage for our data store. These are the steps I took to get everything running on my machine: First, make sure you have installed Kubernetes, and added its namespace to Azure Active Directory. Then, I logged onto my Azure Console and found the Resource Group for my Azure Service Bus in the Azure Portal.
