The "Flash Finder," created by Corel Corp., Insulin resistance and hyperinsulinaemia induced by neonatal subcutaneous injections of methotrexate in the rat. Changes in glucose tolerance and insulin secretion have been examined in rats subjected to treatment with methotrexate (MTX) administered subcutaneously on three consecutive days at birth. A single dose (20 or 40 mg kg<sup>-1</sup>) increased 2-6-fold the hepatic and adipose tissue levels of MTX, but there was no accumulation in the brain, a tissue in which MTX is concentrated. The same treatment led to a marked decrease in tissue weight of the sciatic nerve, and a significant decrease in body weight, food intake, plasma glucose, free fatty acids, and insulin. Pups receiving the lower dose showed enhanced glucose tolerance with a reduced sensitivity to insulin. Although insulin secretion remained unchanged, insulin-induced hypoglycaemia was reduced by more than 50%. The results suggest that insulin resistance plays an important role in the development of dysmetabolism associated with MTX.
