I know `__base__` is like the base class. And `__dict__` is a dictionary, but I'm not sure if they are the same or different. What is the difference between `__base__` and `__dict__`? class A: def `__init__(self)`: pass def `__base__(self)`: return `__dict__` A: `__base__` is an attribute of all classes that references the class they were defined in. `__dict__` is an attribute of all objects that contains the object's attributes. Both are part of the types in the abstract base classes used to model Python objects. So for example, for a normal class or instance, `__dict__` contains the attributes of the object that it is part of. For example, using your A example, for a normal class or instance, `__dict__` would contain 6d1f23a050
