NET Framework.NET 5 has been rebuilt as a native 64 bit compiled application, instead of being built as a portable application which requires 32 bit compatibility. Additionally, the runtime for.NET 5 will support the.NET Framework 4.8 Runtime, which will allow.NET 4.8 apps to use the.NET 5 Runtime. This is a big change that was needed for.NET 5.0. On my Surface 2, that's under a gig, but I did realize earlier that there are other ways to get the package, while also using a piecemeal approach..NET 4.5 can be downloaded and installed as part of Visual Studio 2015. This will only download the bits that are needed. Although it doesn't do an install of the entire framework, it does install a few components that are commonly used with.NET: .NET Runtime Type Resolution Support Deployment Support 3rd party DLL Dependencies In.NET Framework 4.5.1 and 5, the bootstrapper can no longer decide which version of.NET Framework should depend on which version because.NET Framework now imposes an explicit version requirement for.NET Framework on the bootstrapper. Clicking the download link for the.NET Framework 3.5 will download 1.1 GB. That's 60 megs, which is somewhat smaller than the most recent.NET 4.5.1 pre-release. The reason for the small size difference is an increase in the binary packager file size (by about 0.5 megabyte). This is largely because the packed files have a more robust and structured format. We can also support streaming the contents of the installation package to clients that do not have Internet connectivity. This is more of a formality, as this is how the package downloads normally. We do not need the Windows Installer to be able to stream the installation package to a system that is offline; that is what the bootstrapper accomplishes.
