aside from the vehicles and the various units, the game also includes an arsenal of special abilities, like cloak, shield, scout, and probe. these can be activated by holding down a button or quickly moving a cursor over the relevant screen element. if the button or cursor is over a building or unit, the ability will be triggered, such as cloak over an enemy unit, or shield over an enemy building. you can use these abilities in a variety of ways, such as capturing enemy buildings, disarming enemy units, or, if they are used over a building with a teleporter, deploying a probe to jump into the building and cause a disruption in the structure. the game includes five campaigns, plus a tutorial and training mission. the campaigns are essentially the standard military scenarios you'd expect, though most of them include more than one scenario. while you start with the infantry, the various missions will eventually give you access to the other types of units in the game. for example, the liberator dropship campaign includes a number of scenario missions in which you'll complete objectives like destroying specific buildings, planting mines, and locating enemies. the first campaign is the liberator, which includes a few miscellaneous objectives such as destroying a number of enemy units, and then it concludes with a final mission to deploy a liberator near the lab. the game's unit production system is the heart of the game, and it includes several unique elements. the first is the unit's level, which is measured in a complicated way by both its age and its condition. the age starts at zero, and then you can add experience points, which are gained from defeating enemies. units can gain points by destroying buildings, and also by completing missions. each mission you complete awards you experience points based on the mission's difficulty, which is based on the number of enemy units in the mission.
