for the normal growth, development and maintenance of female reproductive tissues.
Our laboratory has focused on the direct estrogen-mediated regulation of gene expression and the mechanism by which estrogen mediates these effects. The family of nuclear receptors for steroid hormones includes the glucocorticoid, mineralocorticoid, androgen and estrogen receptors. The principal means for transmission of steroid hormone signals are ligand-activated transcription factors. The estrogen receptor (ER) is a nuclear receptor that is activated by the steroid hormone estrogen. The ER binds specifically to a specific DNA sequence (estrogen response element or ERE) and regulates transcription of target genes. We have identified, cloned and characterized genes that are activated by estrogen in neonatal rat ventricular myocytes and cultured neonatal rat ventricular myocytes. In addition, several transcription factors have been identified that are activated by estrogen signaling in myocytes. This project has three major specific aims. In aim one, we will identify novel genes activated by estrogen signaling in neonatal rat ventricular myocytes. The genes will be cloned and characterized with respect to transcriptional regulation by estrogen and trans-acting transcription factors. In aim two, we will identify the direct physical interaction of estrogen receptor alpha with novel estrogen regulated transcription factors. In aim three, we will identify the role of novel transcription factors in the regulation of gene expression in response to estrogen. In addition, we will investigate the localization of the transcription factor in the neonatal rat ventricular myocyte nucleus. Together, these studies will increase our understanding of the direct estrogen-mediated regulation of gene expression in the neonatal f988f36e3a
