Timetracking does not integrate into the Timeline very well, but there are some innovative features that can be used. The new preset features are called Presets, but unfortunately you cannot change the folder that is associated with them. Some of the new user interface issues are caused by the fact that this version is a pre-release version. So, expect a few bugs to surface. But apart from that, it is a stable update and an improvement over the previous version. The new panorama shooting feature allows you to stack up to 6 images together to create 360 degree panoramas, and option to switch between subjects. It is not like some cameras, which feature a single automatic scan and you have to manually adjust it, as you will always have an opportunity to provide a different angle of the same subject. The other interesting thing is that you can now take offset pictures with a single press of the shutter button, and the resulting panorama will be based on the largest number of images. The images will then be stitched together afterwards. The new canvas display mode is absolutely brilliant, since here you can apply incredibly accurate tone curves, without losing all the dynamic range. You no longer have to experiment with muted highlights and shadows to recover detail in either. The Timeline is of particular interest to someone who puts together a TV or movie with video clips and photos. (Remember, the Pixel Space Preview is not actually using the timeline— only the Project Panel). The ability to simply drag items between different frames is useful. While the events for each frame are not always sequential, the app is smart enough to know what to do.
