This update also includes a new feature called Shape and Shape Paths. In conjunction with Object and Shape Selection, you can now label nodes and edit them with the new bezier tools. The evolution also includes a new “Autofit” mode that makes the shape more or less consistent when you reposition it. You can use the new Options bar shortcut for the command or control+command+shift+A combinations, which are a lot easier to remember than people realize. I’ve rarely used the menu with the hand tool, and never with the pen tool. I’m a big fan of the Layers panel and have it on my desktop as well and when I see it on the iPad, I was definitely excited. The panel lets you see all layers and groups within a file. It also allows you to lock and unlock different document features and effects just as you can on the desktop. It’s super easy and works just as well as on the desktop. The addition of the document view makes you dive right in and add layers without having to revisit a linked file in the Project panel. The new Transform Panel allows you to freeze the mouse pointer as you dynamically manipulate a layer’s position or scale. There’s also a new History Panel, which lets you click a movement and see the original layer state prior to applying it to all that other stuff. One of my favorite discoveries was how well you can apply a filter to a layer by selecting it and dragging it onto the filter bar that appears immediately below it in the panel. The new panel is also nice to the touch, and will be even better when the next update is released.
