It is used to create a variety of photographs and other media. It is important to us that we do the right thing, moving a number of our product and technology initiatives that were released under a thin veneer of 'beta' products, to a more complete set of APIs. This move of Photoshop technologies is part of our broader "transition to native" initiative. For us, native is not just about software running on native hardware. It's about working with a more stable set of APIs that adhere to the GPU-accelerated application programming concept. The native APIs align with our philosophy that Photoshop is a high-performance 'GPU-accelerated' software. Right now, we're focused on the Core Features that comprise the Leadership Line, which run across virtually every Adobe Product. Starting with new tools and innovations that improve the way you create and deliver images, to better pre-production experiences, like the ability to import directly into Adobe Premiere Pro. We are looking to align our native GPU and native APIs across the Adobe family of products. All the apps and tools will have direct GPU-accelerated APIs, and in the next few months, we will migrate them to these native APIs. This doesn't mean that some apps and features will be cutting edge and some won't be. We are a rapid-release organization, and we want to make sure all our products have the same level of polish. As such, this is how we'll be able to better bring to life the promises of enhanced productivity brought about by the release of native native APIs across multiple products.
