I will admit I did not use the program immediately after I bought it. There were a number of things that I wanted it to do, but because of the size of the file I have to download it takes somewhere around a minute to a minute and a half per image. When it was done downloading, I was on Windows 7. When I got to Windows 8, the size jumped up about 5MB and it was a bit choppy even after downloading it. I also wanted the ability to create some Histogram/Grayscale/Tabular descriptors of sorts, which I had to download separately. I wanted full-color transparency support, and to go mobile, which the software didn't do. The tabular descriptors and transparency support are a huge plus, but I've come to feel that mobile won't be a big deal to the average user. This version even included the "image repair" Times Square tower mode. Most editing programs do these days, but when I first got my new camera and downloaded the software, it said the image needed repair. Imagine that. I had to work with that so I could get more than what I paid for. Today's offering is sure to give you a lot of pleasure. I'm not a huge "AOL" guy, but I have been dying for some of their content since the crappy days of GeoCities and their early sites. Lots of folks were addicted to young band photos, but I preferred DHT and some rap groups. It's not often I feel nostalgic these days. I pay only a little more than I did when I was a kid for things like this. For those reasons, I enjoy looking at FlickrR. It's set up to be a creative site, but not downmarket. You can sign up for a free account, browse hundreds of thumbnails of recent content (and light up the site with your usage), and even create your own galleries.
